TWO (2) HOURS OF TRANSITIONAL CLE CREDIT

Survivors of interpersonal violence; sexual assault, domestic violence, stalking, face an uphill battle when seeking assistance. On their journeys to justice and healing, the trauma experienced manifests in various ways that survivors are not always aware of or prepared to handle. Given this, it is key for those working with survivors to be aware of the neurobiology of trauma and various techniques to work through these confusing moments to provide the best representation possible. Participants will learn how the brain and body respond to trauma, techniques to better prepare clients for problematic situations, and how the brain processes and recalls memories from these events.
